Colder weather on the way

18 November 2010

Following recent spells of wet and windy weather, forecasters at the Met Office are predicting a change to colder conditions as we head through the weekend and into next week.

The change will see the return of overnight frosts and showery rain in many eastern regions of the UK, with a wintry mix over the hills.

Met Office Chief Forecaster, Richard Young said: “Temperatures are expected to fall during next week, with eastern parts of the country the most likely to see any wintry weather.”
